covered healthcare. But I have not rebroadcast anything or taken their point of view on anything knowingly.

MS. SPEIER: Have you promoted better relations with Russia on a segment?

MR. EPSHTEYN: I don't think so. I have to recall each one. You know, I talk about my foreign policy views, I think, but, you know, I don't think I've used any of my segments to talk about Russia relations. I've talked about North Korea. I've talked about Middle East.

MS. SPEIER: Have you ever criticized Vladimir Putin or Russian policy?

MR. AMOLSCH: I think we're way off of cyber hacking at this point.

MS. SPEIER: All right. Let me ask you this question. During the campaign, on CNN News Day Saturday, you said -- you criticized Clinton's policy towards Russia and claimed she is a complete unhinged warmonger and is trying to start a war with Russia. You later said that she was negative, negative, negative, and absolutely not productive.

Is that true?

MR. EPSHTEYN: I -- you know, as I think we talked about earlier, I made over a hundred -- I made over a hundred appearances, probably more -- way more than that. So if you have a transcript of that or could show me a video, I, you know --

MR. AMOLSCH: If that's what the video shows.

MR. EPSHTEYN: If that's what the video shows, that's what the video shows.

MS. SPEIER: Okay. So was that a talking point or an opinion?

MR. EPSHTEYN: You know, I think you could talk -- go in length about Secretary Clinton's approach to Russia. They went from trying to get to a reset with Russia, and then she, when it became politically convenient for her, pivoted. And I think that's what I was trying to say. And, you know -- and that was my position.

MS. SPEIER: During a segment on the PBS NewsHour, you said --

MR. AMOLSCH: I'm going to say we're going to move off this topic.

MS. SPEIER: Well, I've got one last question, then I'm moving off the topic.

MR. EPSHTEYN: Let's do it.

MS. SPEIER: It's actually the Clintons who have been too cozy with Russians. What's that -- what do you base that on?

MR. EPSHTEYN: The fact that President Clinton made half a million dollars for a 90-minute speech in Moscow. The fact that -- the famous uranium deal that Secretary Clinton facilitated. All the business that John and Tony Podesta, and Heather Podesta have done in the former Soviet Union.

So I base that on the facts that have been out there about the relationships between the Clintons and their cohorts and Russia.

MS. SPEIER: So you can very easily remember those talking points.

MR. EPSHTEYN: They're not talking points, just what I remember from the campaign.

MS. SPEIER: John Podesta has been associated with Podesta Group for -- since early 2000s, was there briefly in 2014, and has not been associated. So --

MR. EPSHTEYN: Okay.

MS. SPEIER: It's a talking point.

MR. EPSHTEYN: It's not a talking point.

MR. AMOLSCH: It's okay.

MS. SPEIER: I yield back.

MR. SCHIFF: I yield back.

MR. ROONEY: Thank you. Thank you very much. That concludes the interview.

[Whereupon, at 1:58 p.m., the interview was concluded.]
